Medieval Utraquist Sermons on Czech Patron Saints

Abstract

This article analyses medieval sermons about Czech patron saints given by Czech Utraquists using digital humanities tools. Lists of sermons by Jan Hus and Czech Utraquists about Czech patron saints are provided in the appendices.

This study was created at Charles University under PROGRES program Q09: History – The Key to Understanding the Globalized World.

Preaching was an important part of literary culture in late mediaeval Bohemia, but research has paid only limited attention to the sermons delivered by both Czech Catholics and Utraquists.¹ Preaching, despite its significant representation in preserved manuscripts, is a specific genre on the periphery of the literary field. It primarily originated in pastoral work and differed from the “high” genres of literature. The first suitable step would thus be to perform a quantitative analysis of the preserved sermons.

Postils are collections of sermons for Sundays and feasts during the Liturgical Year. Some include texts for the feasts of saints, either collections for the whole year or special, artificial collections dedicated to individual saints. Sermons on the saints are specific because the selection of the saints in a particular collection represent the editor’s preferences. They also provide evidence of development in the cults of individual saints. In Western Europe, preachers’ interest in saints grew from the 13th century. The research thus far has focused on this period and resulted in a typology of sermons about saints.²

Czech Utraquists also preached on the feast day of saints. The contemporary criticism made by Catholics who claimed Utraquists did not recognise the feasts of saints has thus been proven to be unjustified, though heretofore research only marginally dealt with preserved Utraquist sermons.³ While noting the preaching, it has focused on the work of individual preachers, on anonymous collections,⁴ or in rare cases it addressed the individual saints.⁵ However, a thorough investigation and overall evaluation of Utraquist sermons on saints, both of the texts and the material features of the records is still lacking.

It must be noted that the initial situation is favourable for research. The corpus of Utraquist postils is clearly defined, at least at the level of whole collections.⁶ In addition, it is easy to distinguish three generations of Utraquist preachers and to compare their work with the preaching of Jan Hus.⁷ In this article, I would like to analyse medieval Utraquist sermons on Czech patron saints (up to 1526, which is the traditional end-point of the Middle Ages in Bohemia), as these sermons testify not only to the religious, but also the national identity of their authors.⁸ In the appendix, I included complete lists

7 I consider Jakoubek of Stříbro, Jan of Přibram, and Prokop of Plzeň as members of the first generation of Czech Utraquists, Jan Rokycana, Martin Lupáč, Václav of Dráhov, and Jakub of Jemnice as members of the second generation and Wenzel, parish priest at St Gallus and Michal Polák as members of the third generation. For practical reasons, anonymous sermons of each generation are represented as one pseudo-author.

8 I use the traditional list of Czech patron saints venerated in Bohemia in the Middle Ages including St Vitus and St Sigismund who did not live in Bohemia. Cf. Beran (1931). Unlike sermons, the context of liturgy is not researched here, as it would require an extensive specialized study. It would be also desirable to extend the future research until 1620.

of Jan Hus's preserved sermons about Czech patron saints as well as those by Utraquist preachers.⁹

As illustrated in Appendix 1, Jan Hus is the author of 33 sermons in four collections on Czech patron saints and Utraquist preachers wrote 124 sermons in 26 collections over a century.¹⁰ The most prolific Utraquist author was Jakoubek of Stříbro with 22 preserved sermons. Jan Rokycana and Václav of Dráhov are the authors of 13 texts each, Jan of Příbram is credited with 12 texts, and other authors each wrote less than 10 sermons.¹¹

There are only five Czech-language sermons in the whole body of work, all coming from second-generation Utraquist authors. These are the sermon on Saint Vitus (preserved in eight records), the only one dedicated to a Czech patron saint included in the postil of Jan Rokycana; and anonymous sermons about Wenceslaus, Procopius, Vitus, and the Five Holy Brothers preserved in two different collections.

The number of sermons by Jan Hus and three generations of Czech Utraquists on individual Czech patron saints.

¹⁰ Three sermons are counted multiple times, for each generation that used them.

¹¹ In addition, 2 radical collections with 10 and 11 sermons survived, but at least one of these collections has more sermon cycles.

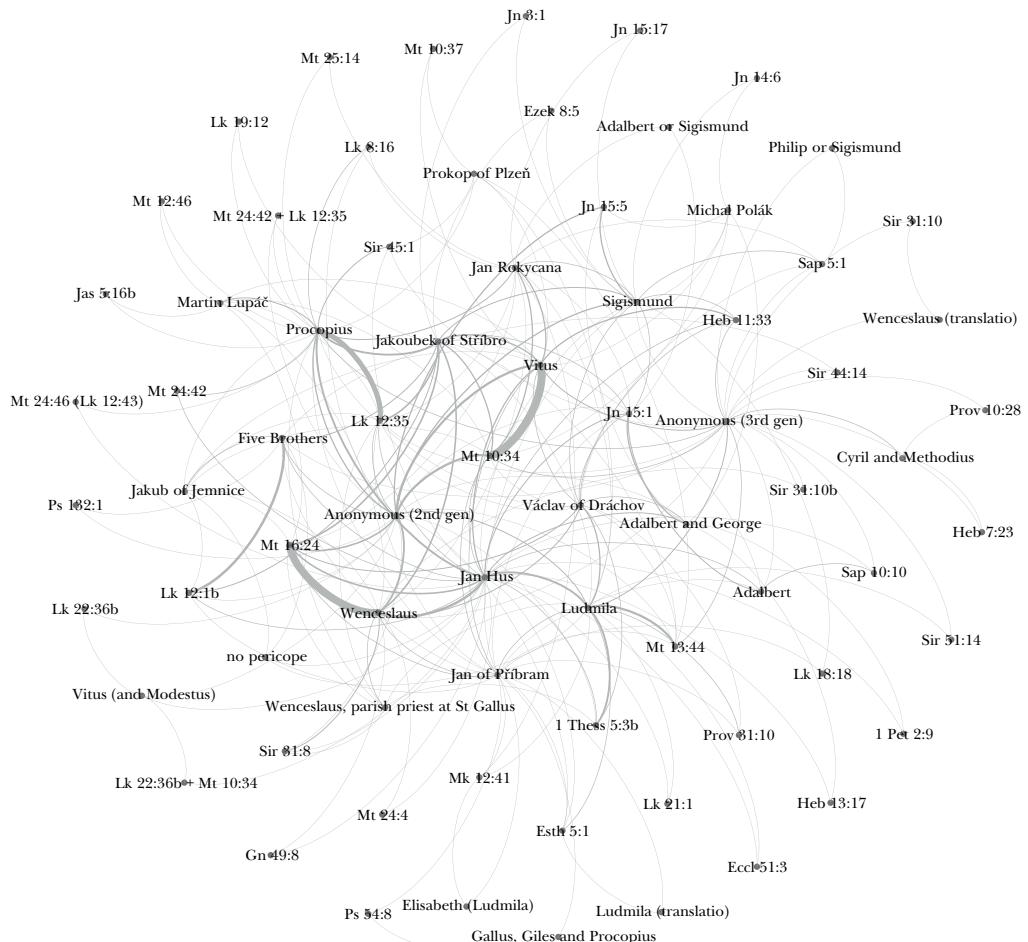

Chart 1 shows the number of feast sermons about individual Czech patron saints by Jan Hus and three generations of Czech Utraquists. The trio of Wenceslaus, Ludmila, and Procopius dominate among Hus's works, followed by Vitus and Adalbert. This changed for the later Utraquists, however. The main Czech patron saints for them were Vitus, Procopius, and Wenceslaus, followed by Ludmila and Sigismund, and then a greater gap to Adalbert, the Five Holy Brothers, and Cyril and Methodius. While the first generation favoured Procopius, the second preferred Vitus, who became the topic of an increasing number of both unique texts and transcripts. There are significantly more sermons authored by the second generation of the Czech Utraquists about the most favoured saints. The third generation only created a few texts, which shows a shifted situation concerning saints. The probable explanation is this new generation could use the rich production from the previous one, but it is important to note that printing had no effect because no sermon on a Czech patron saint was printed during the Middle Ages. Interest in individual saints (except for Cyril and Methodius) developed analogously: After the first generation, whose production is comparable to Jan Hus, the second generation produced a significant increase in output, while the third generation only marginally contributed to the corpus.

Besides the number of sermons, it is possible to quantify some of their features. The first is the pericope used in the sermon. There were no fixed pericopes for the feasts of the saints, so the choice of the pericope itself testifies to the intention of the sermon's author. The pericope was the starting point for interpreting either the theme or the exact biblical text depending on the genre (thematic sermon or exegetic homily).

For each sermon, I recorded three data points: the author, the saint, and the pericope. Each sermon is represented as a triangle of relations between the author, the saint, and the pericope. I visualised the resulting data in a network chart. This approach does not represent a social network analysis as three different classes of nodes are mixed in one chart. It was not possible to create a genuine network diagram as most network analysis methods are unusable because of the heterogeneity and auxiliary character of the pseudo-network constructed. However, all these nodes represent attributes of individual sermons and give context that can be interpreted by reading the graph. I consider the relation of the saint to the pericope as especially important.

It turns out that the preaching of Jan Hus, despite using a greater number of pericopes than the later Czech Utraquists, fits into the whole and there is no eccentricity in the network. With or without Hus, the strong connection between specific pericopes and saints, especially those most represented in the collections, is visible in the chart. Jakoubek of Stříbro, Jan of Příbram, Jan Rokycana, and Václav of Dráhov were significant Hussite authors of sermons about Czech patron saints whose work was at least comparable to one another.

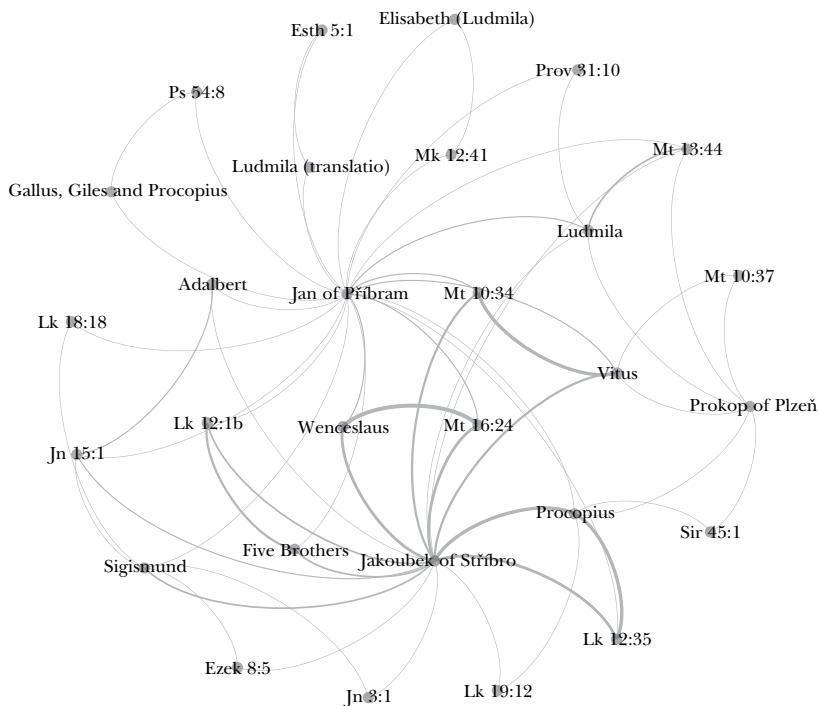

The partial data presented in separate charts allows for a more detailed characterization of the individual generations of Czech Utraquists. In the first generation, Jan of Příbram interpreted excerpts from the Old Testament alongside New Testament pericopes. In the second generation, Václav of Dráhov, who was the most conservative of his generation, followed him in this respect. Preaching among the third generation was complementary to that of both previous generations and more often interpreted excerpts from the Old Testament or Epistles. Many sermons have been preserved without knowledge of the author, which suggests that this generation did not create "authorAuthorities" as the previous two had.

Based on the popularity of saints and the stability of the pericopes used, it is possible to define three classes of saints in the analysed material: a) the popular: Vitus, Procopius, Wenceslaus; b) the less popular: Ludmila, the Five Brothers; c) and the marginal: Sigismund, Adalbert, Cyril, and Methodius. A single predominantly used pericope contributed to the lasting picture of some saints, especially the most favoured, such as

Wenceslaus.¹² On the contrary, the pericope Ego sum vitis vera (Jn 15:1), which was used for preaching about a martyr (de uno martyre), was often used in the sermons about less popular Czech patron saints who were martyrs.¹³ A worthy testimony where Vitus, Procopius, and Wenceslaus were perceived as the foremost Czech patron saints is the sermon on Saint Wenceslaus by Jakoubek of Stribro, where the author names the three most popular saints (including Vitus) as examples of saintly men from the Czech nation.¹⁴

The sermons presented all patron saints as archetypes and models for imitation: Vitus, Wenceslaus, and Adalbert as martyrs, and Procopius as a confessor. They are almost void of narrative elements; the only exceptions being the sermon about Ludmila and Jakoubek's sermon on Wenceslaus. In terms of genre, the texts are thematic sermons or exegetic homilies. Distinctions are present in the introduction and the text is divided into points, helping to abstract the theme. The exegetic homily is common, exposing the individual parts of the pericope.

Based on comparison of each text with others, the analysis also showed the reception of older texts from one sermon collection to another and from one author to another (including the reception between generations). It took different forms: reception of full texts or of the prothema only. In many cases, the sermons were “fluid texts” whose structure changed over time. However, it was impossible to display the reformulation of older texts in charts because there were different degrees in individual cases, something that is difficult to quantify. In the terms of the reception of the text, Jakoubek of Stríbro had an influence on the preaching of Jan of Příbram and Jan Rokycana. The conservative Jan of Příbram had a similar influence on Václav of Dráhov, who, like Jan Rokycana, was a representative of the Hussite “moderate party” but in public affairs proved himself to be a more conservative element. The sermons of Jakub of Jemnice had their Czech-language adaptations and their influence was passed down from the second generation to the third. However, I will present these observations created during the registration and quantification of the material in a suitable form with detailed references to the sources later. I especially refer to the reception of complete older texts in later sermons in the annexes to this article.

Earlier scholars have claimed the cult of the patron saints was important, not only for Czech Catholics,¹⁵ but also for Utraquists.¹⁶ I based the presented research on a quantitative analysis using digital humanities tools. This method made a complete processing of these sermons possible for the first time, including a preliminary evaluation of the content. The research confirms the view that “the veneration of Czech patron saints by members of the Utraquist Church in Bohemia did not differ from the veneration these saints enjoyed in the Roman Church”.¹⁷ In the future, it is desirable to not only extend the research to all Utraquist sermons on saints, but to also compare Utraquist and Catholic sermons.¹⁸

¹⁸ The collections of Czech Catholics from the 15th and the beginning of the 16th century are difficult to date and differentiate from the transcriptions of standard compendia due to insufficient identification in catalogues. Catholic preaching, according to the current state of knowledge, “displays a substantially different picture” than the Utraquist one. Preaching among Catholic exiles differs from the preaching of Catholics who stayed in Bohemia: Older works were transcribed and disseminated, and conservatism and politicisation were clear in the emerging sermons.
